Abstract:

That the arrival of the railway changed people's perception of the world has been well established since Wolfgang Schivelbusch's pioneering work. There is a substantial body of scholarship documenting the nineteenth-century railway's influence on the experience of travel and its impact on different cultural media. The history of railway experience in the twentieth century, when the train was challenged by the automobile and aeroplane, remains neglected in comparison. Trains did not disappear, however, but were invested with new imaginative possibilities, for instance in novels by Graham Greene and Toni Morrison.

This seminar will explore the literary and cultural significance of the railway in the twentieth century. It reflects on new developments in mobility studies and infrastructure studies. We welcome proposals that focus on the relationship between the twentieth-century railway and English-language literature, cinema, the visual arts and/or other cultural modes.

Themes to be explored include, but are not limited to the following:

the railway and (literary) form gender and sexual identity (post)colonial perspectives railway and war experiences of long-distance travel experiences of commuting spaces of the railway the railway's impact on landscape and environment comparisons between literary and visual depictions of the railway
