The politics of mobility – entanglements of power, economy, social inequality, and mobilities – is an abiding preoccupation in social and historical geography, critical mobilities, and transportation studies. These scholarly fields identify mobility (physical movement, and the technologies and substrates stimulating motion and its social-cultural-historical consequences) as a fundamental structuring dimension of social life. They also demonstrate that the capacity for movement under conditions of one's choosing is a valuable resource that is unequally distributed in social contexts structured by hierarchies of power. In other words, movement is socially differentiated; it reflects and reinforces structures of power to configure inequitable social hierarchies. Ironically, and in many cases, the corollary to the politics of mobility is immobility: the social, political, and economic opportunities of mobilizing conspiring, often unwittingly, to impede movement, to hinder the hurry often implied by mobilizing, especially in cities. Critical geographers and mobility scholars trace the ways in which relations of gender, race, class, sexuality, citizenship, and political economy shape discourses and practices of mobility that produce beneficial movement for some people and too little or too much movement for others.

We are seeking papers from geographers and critical mobilities scholars that attend to the multi-scalar relationship between human corporeal movement and power in its everyday, official and multifaceted manifestations. Papers might, for example, (a) delineate a particular set of power relations / of gender, race, class, sexuality define a particular set of power relations (of gender, race, class, sexuality, citizenship) that are operating to produce differentiated movement with particular inequitable social effects; (b) explain how mobility exclusions operate and are experienced; (c) examine formal policies that regulate human movement and thereby produce social hierarchies; (d) reveal how political economies—current and historical—and urban capitalist relations promote, construct, maintain, and even inhibit urban mobilities; or (e) identify mobility strategies and practices employed to negotiate inequitable fields of movement.
