Most tourists want to go somewhere. They seek a change in the environment. The 2 018 Nobel Prize in Literature was awarded to Olga Tokarczuk, who writes extensiv ely on tourism and mobility. She writes of the tourists who are "never truly gon e", like anthropologists writing about differentiated degrees of authenticity wh ich different tourists seek. However, a recurring element in her writing is a ch aracter profile that takes pleasure in not going even when significantly mobile. For example, the joy of road trips, in which the car has everything one needs-th e car constructs the most essential emotional element associated with travel. As for the rest, whether Paris, Lhasa, or Quebecois maple forests, wherever they g o, they don't go. Growing up in Yunnan vaccinated me against my friend's apprais al and death growl for the 'authentic' skies. What does such pleasure—to move bu t not go-feel like? This presentation will engage Tokarczuk with my traveling st ories to theorize and feel the different "beats" between going and moving throug h Lofi music (a type of music that young people love; young as in age, not speci fic to generation). I will then use this distinction between going and moving to look into what synthetic AI and augmented reality will look like for tourism.
