After the lockdown imposed by the COVID-19 pandemic, human mobility has regained momentum both internationally and nationally, for both permanent migration and temporary movements. At the same time, new global trends have emerged, such as the re-evaluation of rural areas as places that provide a better quality of life, an increase in remote work, the rise of digital nomadism, and the search for new lifestyles that ensure a better balance between work and personal time. There is also the emergence of a new value system in which perceived quality of life is influenced by many factors beyond just economic ones.

The Globility-Global Change and Human Mobility Commission, in proposing this session, aims to explore the various forms of (im)mobility that have characterized the European space in recent years. The session intends to discuss both subjective and territorial factors that influence (im)mobility and the impacts that (im)mobility has on both origin and destination areas.

We will consider (im)mobility as the result of a free choice or a lack of options, the influence that personality traits have on (im)mobility, how different life stages entail different (im)mobility, how gender affects mobility decisions, why some regions produce greater (im)mobility, the role played by the territorial endowment of economic, human, and social capital, and the importance of place-identity and place-attachment in (im)mobility decisions.

The session welcomes contributions based on both theoretical reflections and empirical research.
